

Welcome to Woodcock Nature Center!

Founded by former Ridgefield First Selectman J. Mortimer Woodcock in 1972, Woodcock Nature Center has grown to provide educational programming for over 4,000 learners of all ages each year. Our programming includes school field trips, summer camps, and enrichment programs, all of which support our educational efforts by immersing the community in direct experiences with nature. We partner with local organizations to present lectures, workshops, and films, and guided hikes while child and caregiver classes and on-site animal encounters provide a means for the public to engage with and learn from our natural world.

Woodcock's nearly 150 acres, originally inhabited by the Siwanog tribe and today owned by the state of Connecticut, straddles both Wilton and Ridgefield. The preserve includes historic stone walls and stands of old maple, beech, oak and hickory trees, a pond, wetlands, vernal pools, and nearly four miles of hiking trails which remain a resource for thousands of hikers, birders, and outdoor enthusiasts. Woodcock's trails, natural playground, nature center, and outdoor aviaries (where we care for ambassador animals which includes 2 non-releasable birds of prey and nearly 20 reptiles and amphibians) are publicly accessible year-round with no admission fee.

Woodcock does not receive any funds from local towns or the state of Connecticut and fundraises privately for every dollar necessary to sustain its programs and facilities—in fact, 50% of our revenues are from these donations along with special events income. We depend on the generosity of private foundations, corporations, and individuals to remain a resource to our community.

Woodcock acknowledges the indigenous tribes of the Siwanog, Ramapo, and Katonah who were the first stewards of the land in Wilton and Ridgefield which we strive to continue to learn from, protect, and respect.

The Woodcock Nature Center property is protected and owned by the State of Connecticut and leased through the Connecticut Department of Energy and Environmental Protection. Additional thanks goes to our trail sponsor, the Outdoor Sports Center.
